ABOUT THE SEMINAR

In the latest years, pharmaceutical products have evolved towards disease- and patient-specific therapeutics, involving meticulous manufacturing steps. In addition, cellbased therapeutics and vaccines present high sensitivity to environmental and transport conditions, complicating supply chain logistics. Increased drug specificity and demand uncertainty are adding a further level of complexity when it comes to the design and operation of robust manufacturing processes and distribution networks. As discussed in this paper, the pharmaceutical industry has taken significant steps towards the improvement of existing and/or the development of novel processes that promise agile, responsive, and reproducible manufacturing. Similarly, distribution networks in the pharmaceutical sector are undergoing a paradigm shift, exploring the capabilities of decentralised models.
